

FR. GARY MILLER

A storybook example of the Archdiocese’s current handling of allegations of child sex abuse, the case of Fr. Gary Miller shows the ineffectiveness of background checks and the acumen of an accused predator when it comes to avoiding civil and criminal liability and supervision.

Miller was ordained a priest in 1972. By the time an alleged victim came forward in June 2012, Miller had undergone the standard criminal background checks required of all priests, employees and volunteers. The victim, who said he was abused in the early 1970s, said that he finally had the strength to come forward after hearing about the Jerry Sandusky trial.

When confronted with the allegations, Miller did not deny them, but instead said that he would “reserve his comments” for later. He also asked questions about the civil and criminal statutes of limitations that would be involved with the allegations. As a result, Leah McCluskey said that she was not comfortable leaving Miller in a parish unmonitored.

By July 2012, Miller had been removed from active ministry and the Review Board decided that the allegation had merit. Miller did not contest the board’s findings and resigned in September 2012. The parish had been notified in the end of September and both parishioners and the Archdiocese were surprised to discover that the finances of the parish and school were in chaos, with unpaid bills and threats that the school would be forced to close.

By December of 2012, Miller was living in an apartment. Neither the leasing office nor the families in the adjoining apartments knew about Miller’s past. His “monitor” lived miles away. He is under the supervisory protocols of the Archdiocese.

Although removed from ministry, Miller remains a priest.
